“Mr. Speaker:

Appalachian Altibajos

If you asked me for a translation,

I would point to the horizon as it dips and swells
in its effort to steady the sky.

I would pronounce it in the rustling of the mountains,

heads bowed for all that dies in us,
as they bury their weariness
in the comfort of the valley’s waiting arms.

I would spell it in the upward winding of trails

that lace themselves into the ground
and the tautness of trees
swaying between stability and circumstance.

I would call it “noun”:

as in the way the wind opens your chest and crucifies you
even as the earth pulls your heart
down to her stomach.

When you asked me for a sentence,

I would show you where I stood – afraid that I would fall and afraid that I would jump and afraid that I wouldn’t –
and tell you how
I felt the words climbing the steepness of my rocky soul,
but feared the reverberating reality of sound.

And when at last you turned away,

I would whisper to the hills

Te amo te amo te amo.”
