Description

Poor question construction, should say "Which of the following are rights in the First Amendment?"

Poor answer, there have been 27 ratified but 26 still exist.

Poor answer, does not include option of "mixed economy" which is common reference for the American system in economics

Poor question construction, should say "Which of the following are branches of government?"

Poor answer, offers 3 possible answers that depending on the location might be reasonable. "State's Website" should say "state government's website." I think most students would get this one right. Outside calling the President, the other two answers aren't necessarily wrong. I know if some one called/wrote to Representative Welch's office to ask this, they would get a reply.

Jefferson was the primary author but members of the Congress edited and re-drafted the work as well. This question will likely be answered correctly by most students however it negates the actual bi-partisan, back and forth nature that led to its creation. When I taught this we emphasized how Jefferson got the credit for the document- he did a lot- but that a whole lot of other people contributed as well.

The federalist papers are important for how they rallied people to support the constitution- there were multiple authors, given Hamilton's popularity, he is the author best known now.
