Making drivers education classes entirely video instructed is a terrible idea. If all instruction is done online, you're assuming that every student is going to pay attention— not just walk away from the computer and get side-tracked. It's also unreasonable to expect students to not have questions. How is a student supposed to be guided through a learning process with no instructor to answer questions? During the pandemic with remote learning there was a lack of educational support, and I was left with many unanswered questions which made me insecure in the classroom. By doing this you're expecting an entire course of drivers education to be understood and mentally maintained— with no guidance and inaccurate answers to questions— which is just training insecure, nervous drivers who don't properly understand the road. Sure, not every student has access to a driver's education program, but by making everything digital, you're also expecting their parents or guardians to teach them, which is simply unreasonable. Not every adult has the skills, understanding, and mental strength to drive with a license right now, let alone teach their child how to drive. Some kids experience excess stress within the vehicle, others receive no guidance at all; which is one of many reasons why having a driver's education instructor is important during the educational process. It can help students find a safe place to make mistakes and grow, rather than shutting down and mirroring improper driving. This is not a matter of textbook questions and curricular courses taught through YouTube videos. This is a hands-on skill that needs to be taught by proper, licensed instructors in a classroom and on the road because it is a matter of life or death.
